KITE MAKING RESOURCES

Kite making information can be found through the American Kitefliers Association (aka.kite.org), Kitebuilder.com (kitebuilder.com), and Drachen Foundation (drachen.org).

TYPES OF KITES

1. FLAT KITES: When ready for flight, the kite is flat when laid on the ground. Flat kites are usually a simple geometrical shape, like a Diamond kite. Flat kites usually require tails for stability.

2. BOWED KITES: The kite's surface is bowed by use of a bowed spar. When ready for flight, the kite is bowed (not flat) when laid on the ground. Rokkakus are examples of bowed kites.

3. CELLULAR AND DIMENSIONAL KITES: These three dimensional kites use sails and spars to create a rigid frame. Box kites are examples of cellular and dimensional kites

4. SOFT AND FLEXIBLE KITES (including Deltas): These three dimensional kites depend on the force of the wind on the kite, not on a rigid frame, to give the kite its shape. These kites may change their shape depending on the force of the wind. Soft kites, like Parafoils, have no spars. Flexible or semi rigid kites, like Sled or Delta kites, incorporate spars with the spars going in one direction or one plane only.

5. STUNT AND SPORT KITES: These are kites that use more than one flying line to launch the kite into the air and to control its flight patterns. These kites are designed for the purpose of making high-performance maneuvers in flight, sometimes in kite ballets set to music.

6. KITE TRAINS: Trains are multiple kites of any shape or structure that are connected by lines to each other. Each member of the train need not be the same size and shape, but the entire flying structure should be a functional and visual sum of its individual parts.

7. DELTA AND DELTA DERIVATIVES: These kites often have triangular wings. They have spars on the leading edge of the wings, which can pivot on the spreader bar. A keel is usually used but is not always necessary.
